POWER AND PRINCIPLE.

CHAP. XXVII.

He seeth only what is fair,
The upright only what is sweet;
He will laugh at fate and care,
Leave the chiff and take the wheat.
Emerson.

And Rosalie passed into a large, square, well-ordered kitchen, over which presided another Billy—Mrs. Attridge's ex-servant, and now housekeeper and maid-of-all-work. The short history of the transfer of his services was this: Mr. and Mrs. Attridge having no family, grew lonely, and tired of housekeeping in the country. So they broke up their housekeeping, sold their furniture, rented out their place, and came to Shelton, and took rooms at Gardner's Hotel.

"So Billy was out of a place. A great many housekeepers would have been glad to hire Billy. Billy, like all invaluable geniuses, had a great many eccentricities and difficulties to be got over. He wouldn't live in a row of houses, or in any sort of a house, that wasn't a handsome house in a large space, with trees round it. He wouldn't live in a family that had babies, or didn't own a garden. Poultry was also indispensable, and pigs totally inadmissible. And lastly, he wouldn't live—no, not in town or country, neither for love nor money, with anybody who were not good looking. There—to use Billy's own words—he set his foot down, and no one could move him from that position. And so it fell out that Billy would accept no place in Shelton, but continued hanging on to the skirts of his old master and mistress at Gardner's Hotel.

But one day, it happened that Rosalie, after she had dismissed her afternoon school, stood at her neat white kitchen table, kneading bread for supper, when a shadow darkening the door, and the sound of something dumped suddenly down upon the floor, caused her to turn second time. There stood Billy, in his blue cotton jacket and trousers, and clean linen apron and straw hat, with a great bundle at his back, and a heavy trunk at his feet. Down he dropped the bundle upon the trunk, and heaving a deep sigh of relief, said—

"I'm been looking for you to send arter me to come and live 'long o' you. Why aint you sent afore this? Dou't like to be a-losing so much time."

"Why, Billy, I had no idea you wished to come and live with us," returned Rose, in surprise.

"Well, you might a-known it, then! You always knowed I liked you and him."

"I thought you refused to go out to service."

"I fussed all them there," said Billy, shucking his thumb contemptuously over his shoulder, pointing in the direction of the village—"think I'm agoin' to live in a bake-oven, like them there red brick houses!"

"But you might have gone to the country."

"Yes, but you know most all on 'em were so ill—I mean the people, and for that matter the houses too—and then they kept pigs, as made an oughtsomed fragrance, and children, as made worry oneplacent noises. And some places, the masus was ither ugly in her temper, or her face, or in both, which is dreadful. And in other places the master was always quarrelling with the dinner or the dishcloths, in a very miscooming manner. Some on 'em were not nice in their ways; and what couragement would it be to me to jump on a nice clean apron every day, with a nice stiff crease ironed down in the middle of it, to sarve people as wan't nice themselves? So the long and the short of it is, ma'am, that I'm come to live long o' your."

Now Rosalie was so gentle-hearted, that she did not speak her thought, and say—"But we did not send for you, Billy." Yet nevertheless Billy guessed it, for he answered as if she had spoken—

"Well, what o' that? here I am. And here's my trunk and bundle. I paid a man twenty, five cents, to help me bring them over. I reckon I can stay, if I 'gree to stay on your own terms;" said Billy, betraying piteous anxiety nevertheless.

Gentle and truthful Rosalie hastened to set his fears at rest. "Indeed Billy, we shall be delighted to have you. You will be an invaluable acquisition to us. I am only very much surprised that you should have given us the preference."

A bright glad smile broke over honest Billy's face. "Why, you see ma'am, I don't care how much work I have to do, so I be cheerful. I don't care how little wages I gets, I takes it—contented. But I aint got but one life to live on this yeth, and while I do live, I must—I must—I must live in a pretty place, long o' pretty people. Anything else—no matter of me—it stifles of me—it gives me the—mean it makes my wittels disagree with me." And so saying Billy shouldered his bundle and trunk, and took them up stairs to the lofty attic kitchen, as if he had slept there all his life, and knew the way. And then he came down, and took two big buckets, to go to the well. And so, without more ado, Billy was inaugurated in his new place and duties. And a most "invaluable acquisition" he really proved. Billy had now been living several months with the Sutherlands.

To return: Rosalie went into the kitchen, to give directions to Billy about the supper. She found him sitting down, stirring the batter for the pancakes. She told she expected a stranger to tea, and that he must make coffee also, and dress two prairie fowls, and broil some ham. And next she went into her dining-room and set her table, adorning it with her finest damask table-cloth, and best china, and placing upon it her nicest cakes and preserves. She was so engaged when Mr. Sutherland returned, bringing in Uncle Billy.

I cannot do anything like justice to the vociferous joy with which Mr. Bolling rushed up in his dear niece, as he called Rosalie. She received him with an affectionate welcome.

"I am come to stay as long as possibly can, my dear niece. Although a man like me has a great many conflicting claims upon his time and presence of course, nevertheless I intend to stay with you as long as possible."

Rosalie assured him that the longer he stayed the better she should be pleased. And then, as Billy had put supper on the table, she invited him to take tea with them. And Mr. Bolling sat down and enjoyed it with as much gusto as if he had not partaken of a heavy luncheon at Gardner's. When supper was over, and Mr. Bolling had been invited by Mark to take a stroll around the premises, Billy entered, to clear off the table, and pointing with his thumb over his shoulder, he asked—

"Who is you fat, puffed-up fellery, in the rosy face and white jacket and trousers?"

"He is my husband's uncle, and you must speak of him more respectfully."

"That's 'cordin' as he says, I guess," said Billy, as he moved off under the weight of the laden tea-tray.

Rosalie's benevolent heart was so gratified at having some one else to be good to, and Mark was pleased to see her satisfaction, that he became quite reconciled to the intruder. But Billy was not to be mollified. When Mr. Bolling had been domesticated a week in the house, one morning Billy bounced suddenly in upon Rosalie, as she stood arranging the breakfast table, and asked—

"How long is your uncle-in-law going to stay here?"

"I do not know, Billy; probably all his life."

"Oh! he is! Well, I tell you, one of us two's got to leave!"

"Just as you please, Billy. You know, of course, we can't turn out a guest, to gratify you!"

"Well, I give you warning—that's all!" and Billy bounced out in high dudgeon. But presently he came back again.

"Look here, ma'am; I don't want to be unreasonable, but just consider what a difference it makes in my washing and ironing. Look here! every day your uncle-in law puts on a spic span clean suit, all out! every day, clean jacket, clean trousers, clean shirt, clean whatyou-call-ems, and clean drawers, and pocket-handkerchiefs, and clean socks. Now, count. There's seven pieces every day, and seven days in the week; now, how much is seven sevens?—you're a scholar, ma'am."

"Forty-nine!"

"Well, there's forty-nine pieces of clothing, to say nothing of four sheets and two bolster slips, and two pillow slips, and fourteen towels, and table napkins, I have extra washing and ironing for him every week. Now, I'm going to count, and see how much it all 'mounts to—ninety-two pieces! Ninety-two pieces extra washing and ironing! I have to do, all along of your pet uncle-in-law! now, you know I can't stand that! No reasonable woman would want me to stand it! Now, I ask you," appealingly.

"No, of course not," said Rose, thoughtfully.

"So onreasonable in any uncle-in-law to act so."

"You must excuse our visiter, Billy. He has been used to the convenience of a large plantation laundry."

"Well, I think he ought to stand there."

"We will put out Mr. Bolling's washing."

"And put yourself to an extra 'spenses, and not have clothes hall done? No, I cant 'pose on you that way, neither. Well, I'll not give warning yet awhile! I'll see how long I can stand it!" And Billy left the room, and took more pains to please his gentle mistress that day than he ever did before.

"There was no love lost on Mr. Bolling's side either, and—"Uncle Billy, fellow!" and "Is he an idiot?" and "You all spoil that fellow of yours, Mark!" fell often from his lips, and sometimes in honest Billy's hearing. And one day, while the family were all gathered round the dinner table, Mr. Bolling said to his niece and nephew—"My dear children, I must request you to drop the name of Uncle Billy, and substitute Uncle William, when you address me. There are two of that name in this house, and if you call me Uncle Billy, strangers might confound me in some way with Billy Hampton in the kitchen there, which would not be complimentary."

Rosalie afterwards thought that her facetious mast have heard these offensive remarks; for the next evening, as she entered the kitchen, to order supper, he approached her respectfully, and said—

"Mrs. Sotherland, ma'am, if you please, ma'am, I would be thankful if you'd be so good as to call me William, which is the name given me by my sponsers in baptism, and not 'Billy,' for fear people might get me jumbled up in their minds along o' that fat, lazy man, in white teeth and linen, which would lose me my good character, and be very cruplesant to my friends."

CHAP. XXVIII.

Though with my high wrongs I am stirred to the quick,
Yet with my nobler reason gainst my anger
Do I take part: rather much I rejoice
In patience than in vengeance.—Shakspeare.

Mark Sutherland had been home eight days before he broke to Rosalie the sad news of his uncle's betrayal of his trust, and her own loss of fortune. Rosalie heard it, with sorrow and amazement. She replied by not one word, but dropped her head upon her hands, and remained silent so long that her husband became anxious and alarmed. In truth, it was a most bitter disappointment to the young wife—she had looked forward to her coming of age and to her coming into possession of her fortune, with so much impatience, with such bright anticipation, not for herself, but for her husband's sake. It would have placed them in so much more favorable circumstances. It would have relaxed the tight, sham, office work, from the overtasked, weary lawyer, and left him more leisure for the study of the higher and more attractive and more honorable branches of his dry profession. It would have afforded him means and leisure for engaging actively in political life, and never was the country more in need of honest men "to the fore." It would have enabled him to assist largely in the public improvements of the growing city. Nay, what good might they not have done with the large fortune that was lost? Indeed, it was a sudden calamity, which, to Rosalie, and oh! worse than all, was the thought of him whose guilty hand had dealt that blow. She sat so long overwhelmed, as it were, by the shock, that her husband—Heaven forgive him—misunderstood her silence and stillness, and misconstrued her behaviour. At last he said—

"Rosalie, my love, look up! This loss of fortune, which you take so much to heart, is not inevitable, irrecoverable. Disclaim the signature, expose the forgery, and—"

She raised her head, and looked up at him, with wonder in her mild, mournful eyes.

"And what then?"

"You would not be much more be touched by the forged mortgage."

"And the man who confidingly loaned the money on the mortgage?"

"Will lose fifteen thousand dollars."

"And—and—Clement Sutherland?"

"May go to the State's prison for ten years."

She suddenly dropped her head upon her hands, and shuddered through all her frame, and remained silent for another while. And then she raised up and threw herself in his arms, and clasped him around the neck, saying—

"We must lose it, dear Mark; we must lose it! Oh! I am so sorry for you!"

"My poor Rose, I knew what your decision would be; I told the wretched man so. But, my dearest, it is proper that I should set the matter before you in its true light. Should you fail to expose the forged mortgage, you will not only lose the sum of forty thousand dollars, which was raised by the forged mortgage on your plantation, but, by the foreclosure of the mortgage, and the peremptory sale of the plantation, the property will be sacrificed at about a fourth its real value, and you will lose all, my poor Rosalie."

"I do suppose so. Well, well; let all go—all, but peace of mind; for, my dearest Mark, could you or I enjoy peace of mind—could we take pleasure in our morning ramble, or our evening fireside—could we take comfort in anything, dearest Mark, if deliberate deed of ours had consigned a fellow-creature—an old, grey-headed man—to a prison! Oh, never let it be dreamed of, Mark?"

"That is a woman's thought! Men would deem it a stern duty to prosecute the criminal!"

"And do you so deem it?"

"I should so deem it, but for the thought that this is the old man's first offence, under great temptation; that it surely will be his last; that imprisonment, in his case, would not be reformatory, but ruinous; that no one can be tempted by the impunity of his crime, since no one but ourselves know it."

This was all that was said then. Mr. Bolling's entrance interrupted the conversation; and Billy soon appeared and summoned the party to tea. And though Rosalie presided at her supper table that evening with a graver face than usual, yet she did her duties so well, Mark was pleased to see her satisfaction, that he became quite reconciled to the intruder. But Billy was not to be mollified. When Mr. Bolling had been domesticated a week in the

FAMILIAR LETTERS FROM CUBA.

MATANZAS, ——

To the Editor of the National Era:

I remember to have seen, somewhere, an old bill of the Haymarket, of the days when the "beauty of the science of defence" used to be displayed on those boards, in which, after the usual setting forth of the names of the performers and the feats to be performed, follows this notice: "Frenchmen are requested to bring smelling-bottles!" This considerate advertisement ought to be extended to all persons who venture upon spending a day at the chief hotel of Matanzas. The very frames of the windows in this lonely house are odorous of bad cooking, and the stone floors are foul as unwashed plates. The fresh air, circulating freely through the open architecture peculiar to these Southern lands, cannot chase away the ancient, mouldy smells that linger about the place, and, sitting in the open verandah, one has but to close his eyes on the scene without, to fancy himself in the rez de chaussée of one of those ignoble bourgeoise houses of Paris, the fragrance of which I had hoped to have supposed to be quite unlike anything beyond the walls of the "capital of civilisation." Beneath the hotel windows runs a quay, lively with sailors and merchants; over the shallow water, and the inner harbor small craft of all sizes and sorts are forever busily plying, and in the ample bay beyond lie the stately ships that link this tropic island with all the regions of the North. How degrading is the thought that the misdoings of a shabby lord of misrule within the house have power to mar the pleasant impressions of this gay and beautiful scene!

My friends in divers parts of the island have assisted me to such a quiet, satisfactory enjoyment of my exile, that my plans of spending much time in the country, seem to have been completely deranged, and my short experience of this hotel has quite put to rest any regrets on that score which had not been lulled before by my conviction that an invalid could not do better than give himself up to the reviving influences of pleasant society in a kindly atmosphere. Yet I should have been sorry to quit Cuba without paying the tribute of a visit to the "romantic valley of Yumuri," whereof I had read so much in the verses of my old friends, the Cuban poets, and to the birthplace and scene of martyrdom of the gifted and unfortunate Plácido. The theory that picturesque scenery is the heaven-appointed nurse of poets is hardly borne out by facts, and we might, perhaps, come nearer the truth by saying that the poets of all lands have made the scenery of their homes picturesque. However this may be, there can be no doubt that the picturesque beauty of Matanzas and its environs is so particularly pleasing to those who have learned to associate its name with the best fruits of intellectual effort that Cuba has yet produced. Commerce is always transfigured to us in a foreign land, knowing little of its agents, and being brought into contact with none of its petty details and more belittling influences, we contemplate it in its grand reality, and can feel the full majesty of its wonderful working. Poetry is invested with a singular dignity, and even molasses becomes romantic in the tropics. Still, one is glad that another interest beside that which probably has its root in the sugar-cane, breathes like the south wind over this delicious town, stealing and giving odors.

As I sat last night at my hotel window, my too keen sense of the abomination within doors slowly gave way to a luxurious reverie, tranquil as the motionless waters of the bay on which I gazed, and lit up by thoughts serenely bright as the cool stars that so shone in the clear sky as almost to make one forget or forgive, at least, the absence of the moon. I admit that my placid enjoyment of this reverie was most miserably disturbed by a brawl beneath my windows, between the crews of two boats at the quay. The spear-bearing policemen came running up; but high and loud above the din of thwacks and kicks rose the profane vociferations of the war-crews, officers and the guardians of the city's peace forthwith resolved themselves into an audience, and stood by to watch the sport, which they appeared to enjoy as much as any of the spectators. Meanwhile the belligerent tars Dacian barbarians, import ed to make them holyday. The battle, though fierce, was brief; and when it ceased, the combatants, like true sons of Neptune, gathered together to drink the draught of peace. The bruit of this vulgar quarrel passed over the holy silence of the night, if as fouly yet as swift as the flight of pitchy vulture disappears under the blue heaven in a summer's day, and left no trace behind. The far-off ships grew dim on the bay; the lines of light along the curving city faded, light by light; and in the dead hush of the night I thought again of the brave Plácido in the solemn vigils of his last night on earth. The manly farewell taken by Juan de Padilla of his wife, when he consented to die with the liberties of Spain, is famous in the history of human nobleness; but the not less manly death of Plácido has no place in the calendar of heroism. The Pariah, who may not sit with the Caucasian at the festive board, must not be remembered with them when dead. No thoughtful man can wish for the triumph of barbarism over civilization, or even of an inferior civilization over a higher; but the heart cannot the less grant its tribute of admiration to a hero, that the head must decide against the cause he espouses. Hereward the Saxon must be a glorious character of which to some of those who see most clearly the superiority of the Norman society over the Saxon; and I pity the man whose philosophy of history makes him indifferent to the fate of the self-taught and high-hearted slave whose lowly life-blood breathed only filial love and the conscious sense of right. I think you will forgive me if I republish here this farewell, in a translation which, though irregular, is yet verbally faithful:

"The appointed lot has come upon me, mother!
The mournful ending of my years of strife.
This chamber, this cell, is my sepulchre, and is another,
Through blood and terror, reascends my life!
And thou, grief-smitten, cease thy mortal weeping,
And let my son be worthy of his sire.
I fall for right! and thoughts of thee are sweeping
Across my soul like a dirge of fire!
A strain not sad, but free and high—unfalling—
Most glorious and holy—pure, divine,
And some (oh! blessed thought!) shall give [illegible]
I uttered at my birth. Yes; I resign,
Even, now, my life! Even now, descending slowly,
Faith's mantle falls me to my slumbers holy!
Mother, farewell! God keep thee, and forever!"

MATANZAS, ——.

To-day I made a hurried excusion about the city and neighborhood, finding many things to admire and regret the loss of my proposed visit in this quarter. Matanzas, as you know, is the second city in importance in Cuba, containing about 23,000 inhabitant; and its commerce, particularly with the United States, is very considerable. The quay has a busy aspect, though the city in general is much less lively and animated than Havana. One sees wooden houses, too, once in a while; and as the proportion of foreigners to the population is greater by larger here than in the capital, one hears more English spoken. Matanzas has its forts, sufficiently formidable to serve as eyebrows on the face of a scene that, without them, would be in the strongest possible contrast with the ferocious name which it bears—Matanzas meaning nothing milder than massacres, and attaching to the place, say the legends, as a terrible memorial of the last great slaughter of the poor Indians, perpetrated on the banks of the lovely Yumuri; which Yumuri, by the way, is a beautiful stream, which, after winding by the base of the Cumbre, a very high hill that rises to the north of the city, and broadening into a charming lake, empties into the harbor. Imagine, then, a thousand precipitous picturesque cliffs clothed with vegetable tapestry and tassels of the richest hues and strangest forms. The Cumbre is easily accessible from the city, and the view from its summit is really worth the trouble of getting up. I have a modest objection, springing from a somewhat extensive experience, to all unnecessary climbing of hills. For the most part, going up a mountain to see the country is only putting yourself to a great deal of trouble in order to look on a rather indistinct map. But the Cumbre is not distressingly high, and the world seen from its top does not appear ridiculously small. There is a fine scenidero, too, near which, I should think, might make the inhabitants above-stairs rather nervous everywhere. But the tax-gatherer and the police officer, I suppose, have cheated the earthquake of its terrors.

A pleasant trip from Matanzas may be made to the beautiful little river Caminas—the Hudson river of Cuba—a sinuous, silent stream, gliding through minute gorges, and widening often into minute seas of deep and lofty banks show scarcely any traces of the presence of civilized man, and this secluded river bears no more witness to the changes of human nature and history than it may be supposed the sunrises and sunsets of yesterday or three centuries ago. Hardly in our newest States will you find such tracts of unredeemed wilderness as constantly meet the eye in Cuba, even in populous districts. The country has the air of having been settled in detail.

The Paseo of Matanzas, though less extensive, is much more delightful than that of Havana—the trees being finer, the views amplier, and the ladies lovelier. But why do I draw comparisons in this way? Like sweet music stirring the memory of some old woodland nights upon the sacred Rhine—like songs wafted softly over the calm waters of Leman, while the Alps of Savoy glowed like molten gold in the red, evening light—like these, and all delights that immortalize for us some fortunate hour, the memories of these brilliant evenings shows in the tropics are sufficient each to itself, ambrosial each, and not to be put in rivalry one with the other. The Paseo is the poetry of Kentucky are beginning to think that, for the first time, the matter is to be left to them, and they are looking about to find a remedy for a fault all so well to their liking, in your prayers and your forbearance. Let us also see the exhibition of patience; for the evil will not be removed in a day or a year. As Christians, we are bound to believe that God is a man, we will vigorously, but prudently, and as we deem best, labor for its extermination.

Although the Church may not acknowledge it, some credit is due to C. M. Clay, and the true men of Kentucky, who have boldly advocated emancipation as the duty and policy of her people, and to them may be attributed the discussion of the matter "as a question of dollars and cents"—a question which the Church did not originate. We rejoice in the hopeful view here exhibited, and trust the day will soon come when Emancipation will be proclaimed in Kentucky.

LETTER FROM NEW MEXICO.

SANTACK, N. M., June 27, 1853.

To the Editor of the National Era:

Your valuable papers have begun to make their special appearances at my house, and are read with great pleasure. I am glad to find that the Era still preserves the high tone of its earlier days, and is still equally removed from deflection to a great cause on the one hand, and exaltation on the other.

I write you from a portion of our country which has received from the powers at home a "glorious letting alone." While other Territories have received grants and generous assistance, we have been left to struggle as best we could for existence and prosperity. We have been in the predicament of the poor fellow who fell overboard in the presence of two Irishmen, one of whom bet three shillings that the man would drown, while the other bet two shillings that he would not. A similar bet seems to have been ventured upon by certain dignitaries, who have condescended from time to time to bestow a leisure glance on New Mexico; and one might judge that some, to gain their trifling bet, have done something worse than nothing, in order to drown us; and, after all the sneers and odium, merited and unmerited, which have been heaped upon us, you will yet have the pride and pleasure of seeing Americanism here achieving victories sufficiently brilliant to convince all skeptics and we are still true to the guiding genius of our country.

Any one, who is in the least acquainted with the anarchy which prevails in the Mexican Republic, can readily imagine the confusion and difficulty with which our civil authorities have had to contend, in the prosecution of their legitimate functions.

As it is much easier to build a house in a new spot than on its foundations, I, as one of different size, whose walls must be pulled down and the rubbish removed, so it would have been a work of less difficulty to have formed a government on the land, but on old rotton one never been in existence.

The administration of Governor Lane has laid the plan for a well-defined course of political action, which will in time, when put in operation, and many a sapient official, in the discharge of his duties, is amazed to find that a thing of life and meaning has been intrusted to his keeping.

The Mexican population are living in the utmost peace. Revolutions are no longer talked of. Governor Lane, on his arrival, sent the machinery of law into operation, and finding that, should any disturbance break out among them, he would proclaim martial law, and hang not merely blankets and buckskins, but broadcloth also. This has had a wonderful effect.

The Nabajoes have been showing some signs of dissatisfaction, and the prevailing idea seems to be that they must have one or two sound whipping before they will settle down and follow peaceful occupations.

As the President is determined to support Governor Lane's proclamation, claiming jurisdiction over Mesilla, we may hope, that we have a little brush with Old Mexico; still, it is to be hoped that the affair may terminate amicably. I have a notion that a few more Mexicans conquered would be to us what the Italian victories of Pyrrhus were to him.

A large silver mine has been opened in the vicinity of Don Ana. Some specimens, which have been sent to this city for inspection, will yield thirty-two dollars to the hundred pounds, and, what is still more remarkable, the ore can be traced on the surface of the earth for the distance of forty miles. It will not be long before this wealth will be available to the Territory. Men of capital will embark in this enterprise, and then that part of our country will assume a most vigorous and flourishing appearance. There may be some exaggeration in the statements concerning that mine, but you may rely upon the fact that immense quantities of silver can be obtained from it, with very little labor or expense. The proprietor of the mine now opened, Mr. Stevenson, showed me several specimens of pure silver, which he had obtained with little difficulty, without the use of any machinery.

Our citizens are beginning to spread abroad and settle upon lands hitherto abandoned to the wild Indians. Several farms have been taken up in the vicinity of Don Ana and Pecos. The prospect of having the Pacific railroad pass through this Territory has probably had some influence in these settlements. Some are taking measures to introduce capital into the business of stock raising—a business which formerly produced an annual revenue of nearly $2,000,000, and might again be made exceedingly profitable. One of our citizens, Mr. Maxwell, of Taos, took out this season a drove of sheep to California, and realized a clear gain of some ten thousand dollars by the enterprise. Perhaps some statistics, furnished me by an old American resident, will be of interest to your readers, showing them what profits may be relied upon, even though no foreign market is open for the sale of sheep.

2,000 will sheep cost	$4 000
Interest on 4,000 at 7 per cent.	400
Expense of pasturage for 1 year	96
2 boys	72
Provisions for boys and dogs	56
Whole expense, first year	$4,624
Average increase of 2,000 sheep, 80 per cent., 1,600, worth $2 per head	$3,200
Wool, 5,000 pounds, at 12½ cents per pound	625
Proceeds, first year	$3,825

We have pasture enough the year round to support immense herds of cattle; and we could, without doubt, raise wool enough to supply all the looms in the United States.

But, having detained you sufficiently long for the present, I will close.

Yours, L. S.

LONG AGO.

BY JOHN H. HOOPES.

In vain I strive, with livelier air,
To wake the breathing strain;
The voice of other times is there,
And saddens all I sing.—Moore.

My heart within me yearneth still,
And fancy fancies o'er,
And mem'ry holds in sacredness
The good old days of yore;
For times and things and men have changed;
There's nothing that I know
That seems to me as good and pure
As they of Long Ago.

The days of youth were sweet to me,
And brighter far than now,
For years of pain haveclothed the trees
Of sorrow on my brow;
And darkest clouds are gathering fast
Around me, dark and low,
And gladly would I welcome back
The days of Long Ago.

And forms I loved to gaze upon,
Voices I loved to hear,
All to the "spirit land" have gone—
Have passed the shadowy drear—
Or out upon the wide world roam,
Not knowing where to go,
And sigh when mem'ry calls to mind
The days of Long Ago.

The streamlets flow as gladly by,
And birds as sweetly sing,
And flowers as fragrant grow as then
To bloom in early spring.
They bring to mind the sunny past,
And joys I used to know,
Whose shadows now are parting fast—
They tell of Long Ago.

The leaves have withered in their pride,
And flowers have drooped to die
Thus all have perished—ALL have died—
The things I loved of yore;
The autumn winds their requiem sing
In mournful strain and low,
And gladly would I go to join
The ones of Long Ago.

THE TEACHER'S TRIAL AND REWARD.

BY MARY IRVING.

"At the first moment of recess, the boys sprang tumultuously out. I stepped near the door to listen.

"Ha! so you had to clear up, after all, sir!" cried the boy who had been my first informer.

"What's that to you, picaninny Pete?" retorted the sharp tone of Walter; "babies may mind their own business."

"And big boys better mind their brag!" drawled the other, with a hectoring chuckle.

"Harsh words followed fast, and blows were already on the way. I called suddenly from the door—

"Walter! will you bring me a sprig of that wild honeysuckle in the field, yonder? I want it for my herbarium."

"Nothing restores self-respect and good humor to a young fellow effectually as the commission of an errand, be it ever so slight. Walter came back with a countenance almost cleared, bringing a quantity of the fragrant flowers. I opened my Botany, and asked him to stay while I found the description of the plant, and explained the hard, dry terms that defined it. Then, as I laid it between papers to press, his wondering eyes followed my movements.

"I don't think I should like a herbarium," he said, bluntly, at last, looking down at a fresh flower which he was yet twirling in his fingers.

"Why not?" said I. 'The flower you are holding will fade—the flowers that you left on the stalk, will fade. This one, though it is crushed by your rough handling, yet, I hope, will keep its form and a remnant of its beauty.'

"Well, I think I should like to study flowers, at any rate," he said, with interest.

"I will teach you, if you be a man, with a great deal of pleasure," I said, as I arose to ring the bell. When I passed him, in returning to my seat, I whispered, 'It is hard to keep good resolutions, Walter!' He started, and blushed deeply, for the first time, but took his seat in silence.

"From that day I found little to trouble my peace in Walter. He redeemed his pledge most honorably, and kept his word with me, as though ashamed of his former conduct, and yet afraid to show that shame. He did not grow to my heart as did Eddie. But I wondering day by day, that I felt the chilling city of snares and temptations, and sighed, as I said to myself, 'Would that noble boy could be saved!'

"Three years later found me in the sunny South. I was passing the winter in the uplands of Georgia, when I received a letter from Mr. Carroll, Eddie's father. He informed me that his poor boy had left college, wasting away 'far gone in a consumption,' and that he had been ordered South, as a forlorn hope.

"My heart bleeds that I cannot go with him," the letter ran, "and follow his head on a father's breast, in the struggle which I fear is too near. But you know why that cannot be. It is a great consolation to feel that he will be in the neighborhood of one kind friend. I know how you have befriended my precious boy, and I am sure you will not withdraw your kind offices now, when they will be his only solace in a strange land?"

"A few weeks later I met the invalid himself. He sat, propped up by sofa cushions, with the lurid hectic on his cheeks, and that unnatural light in his eyes which seems to pierce the shadow of death. Was it my Eddie, indeed? that tall, emaciated, spiritualized being? His voice was all that reminded me of the school boy, as he started up with feverish animation, and, exclaiming, 'Miss Willis!' sank back on his couch of cushions. I did not then ask him many questions; for evidently the sight of my face had awakened some thoughts which distressed him. When he afterwards confided to me, in one of the many evenings that I spent in soothing his suffering and restlessness.

"'Oh, Miss Willis!' he exclaimed, seizing my hand, and pressing it against his burning forehead—'to die so young?'

"Words of comfort would have done no good, and I only pressed his thin hand, in token of sympathy.

"'Do you remember,' and he smiled sadly as he looked up, 'what an ambitious boy I was, when I used to sit upon that bench just before your desk, in that old school-house at home? You did not know half the dreams that dazzled me, half the plans I formed, and have since formed for life—and now my life is ended!'

"'Did no plan reach beyond life, Edward?' I whispered. A spasm shook his slight frame, as he again covered his face, and was silent.

"'Ambition had been the idol to which poor Eddie had given himself a living sacrifice. It was hard to say 'Let it go!' even to God.

"'But he did say it, as he lay in child-like helplessness, not many days after, waiting patiently for the Angel of Death to unlock the gate of his earthly life that has no sickness, no disappointment, no end!'

"I planted a laurel on Eddie's grave, and a sensitive plant beside it—mute emblems of the spirit that blooms and rejoices, in the land beyond. 'Why was he taken?' I asked, with tears, as I turned from it the last time; 'had the wicked world no need of his pure spirit? How many temptations might have spared before him!' Thus we complain, short-sighted gropers along the shore of eternity!"

Aunt Hannah paused for the first time, and her pointer her needles upon her idle fingers, as though buried in reverie. Mary drew a deep breath, and asked, softly, at last—

"And what of your self-willed boy, aunt, your Walter? Did he ever cross your track again?"

"Hannah pulled her needles out, and with a poising her needles upon her idle fingers, as though buried in reverie. Mary drew a deep breath, and asked, softly, at last—

"'Ay, twenty years ago I was floating down the Ohio, on a fine steamboat; that is, fine for those days. I was alone, and rather adventurous. But I had an unconquerable curiosity to see the grand old woodland 'of the West' in their glory. They were all around me then. I suppose I should be forced to sail many a long mile beyond the Ohio, now-a-days, to find it. I was lying, one sultry day, by the railing of the guards, enjoying the waving panorama, when a little boy, about four years old, came running by me. His soft hair streamed back on the breeze, and his cheeks glowed with the delight of having escaped from his nurse, in the cabin.

"'Franky!' called a shrill voice, and a woman came hurrying out of the cabin door-way. 'Come here, Franky, rogue.'

"'No, no! don't want to!' exclaimed 'Franky, rogue,' in high glee, backing toward the railing of the boat, as she pursued him. All at once he knocked a part of the guard, close by the gangway, that had been carelessly fastened. It gave way, and, tumbling back, he was just falling over the boat's side, when I caught his velvet frock by the skirt, and held him hanging over the dark blue waters.

"'Nurse and child each gave a scream loud enough to bring crew and passengers in a body to our assistance. I remember that a young woman in a white dressing-gown, with her long fair hair half braided, half streaming, to her waist. She looked more like a startled sunbeam than anything else, as I remembered, as she bounded through the crowd with a mother's energy, and caught her rescued boy in her arms. Oh! she breathed, folding him to her heart. The mere second was for the story, and, turning to me, she caught my hand, and looking up tearfully, she said, 'His father will bless you for this! Oh! could I have met him with only this child!' Leaving her, I came to recover consciousness of her dishabille, she glided back into her state-room, carrying her treasure.

"About an hour afterward, as I sat studying the countenances that moved up and down the cabin, Master Franky's head peeped from behind a curtain, and soon he made his appearance in Bell, followed by one finger to his mother, who had regained her composure. Now, in a neat travelling dress, with a face above the order of common beauty, she seemed a petite embodiment of graceful dignity. The nurse followed, bringing a year-old baby, with peachy cheeks, dark-blue eyes, and dimpled hands.

"I lured the little boy to my side, and asked his mother's permission to take him upon deck, as he seemed restless from confinement.

"'Certainly I can trust him with you, if you will take the trouble of watching him,' she replied, gratefully. 'Will you be a sad rogue?' The smile that dimpled her face as she said this, unulled the shake of the head that accompanied it.

"'Are you a minister's boy, are you?' I asked of the little fellow, after some remark from him about his father, whom he expected to meet at L——— in a few hours.

"'No!' replied the boy, with curls archly.

"'What then, a doctor's boy?'

"'No, no!' he shouted gleefully. 'I'm a profession's boy, that's what I am!' I want to climb this fence, and see what I can do at still!'

"I found my task of guardian no very easy one; for the little fellow insisted on being escorted over the whole boat, and getting answers to a thousand and one, odd questions.

"The supper bell rang, and I saw the young mother escorted to the head of the long table by the gentlemanly captain, who, with a kind gentleness, paid most assiduous in attentions to her. Franky was called to her side, and I lost him for a time.

"I next caught sight of his round, curly pate, crossed in a blue cap with gold tassel, as he ran to my side, where I was standing, with a bell, and shouted 'Here she is, mamma! I've catched her!'

"His mother came forward, in bonnet and shawl, ready for landing, as the bell of the city we were nearing. A bright glow broke over her face as she laid her tiny gloved hand on my arm, and said—

"'I have received see you, madam, if you will permit me to introduce you. He will soon be on board. What name shall I give him?'

"'I gave her my name.

"'Mr. Sutherland! remember it,' she said, with energy. 'Franky, dear, don't go quite so near the side of the boat. You have made me tremulous all day. There! stays is coming soon. Stay with mamma, Franky, dear.'

"Our boat struck the wharf soon, and the bustle and confusion of landing and unlading began. Suddenly a tall gentleman pushed his way through the crowd, leaped upon the pier, and sprang upon deck with one bound.

"Franky clapped his hands and screamed with delight; the baby crowed an echo of his joy, and the mother was not way. The young wife was already in the arms of her husband.

"'Lizzie!' he exclaimed, but she did not speak a word. She had forgotten me, I saw, and feeling myself quite an intruder, I was turning away, when she caught my sleeve.

"'Oh! Miss Willis! stay! Walter, you must know our boy from drowning!'

"'Miss Willis!' exclaimed the gentleman, quickly, seizing my hand, and scrutinizing my face with a pair of keen dark eyes—'the same, the very same! My dear lady, what chance sent you into this quarter of the globe? Why, do you not recognise your plague of school-days, your thorn in the spirit, your culprit'—

"'Can it be Walter R——?' I asked, staring at him in a kind of bewildered surprise.

"'Nobody but himself, dear Miss Willis, and as great a rogue as ever, as Lizzie there can testify. But this is no place for parley! Come! you are not going on to-night? You shall not! Here, follow, take off these trunks!' he called to a porter. 'I shall settle the question of your destiny for to-night, leave or no leave, Miss Willis,' he exclaimed archly, as he turned to search for my trunk. 'If You see Walter R——has not forgotten his disregard of all powers that be?'

"I never passed an evening of more unalloyed pleasure than that first evening in the home of my former scholar, now 'Professor R——of ——— University,' and his girlish wife. Walter had graduated with the highest honors, genius that his youth had given, in the face of temptations that had beset his path in no common degree. I saw at a glance the lawless vehemence of his nature had been turned into the broad current of useful energy, and was working mightily for himself and for the world.

"I asked him, one day—for I was detained a 'close prisoner' by his hearth not a few days—when it was that he had changed from the idler to the ever-busy—from the wayward to the enthusiastic being that he was.

"He paused a moment, and then with a look into which his soul poured a world of meaning, said—

"'I was, Miss Willis, when I laid a paper upon your desk, pledging my support to law and order. God bless you, my brother!' My friend!' He grasped my hand warmly, dropped it, and went hastily out.

"'I will not weary you with a much longer story, my patient Mary. It is enough to say that the happiest days—yes, months, of my later life, have been passed in the family of Professor R——, since then removed to a corresponding post of usefulness at the East, or in the society of his precious children, who come, like angels, to gladden my hearth and heart.'"

Mary looked up with an inquiry on her surprise-parted lips. Aunt Hannah laid her finger on them with a smile of much meaning and much love, while with her other hand she gently drew a locket from its nestling place over the blushing girl's heart.

In short, let me finish my story in proper style, Mary. In short, you, have met them here, have loved them here—and"—she struck a spring of the locket, and held up a bright manly face before Mary's sparkling eyes. "And my Mary, to day, is the chosen bride of the roguish Franky, whose steps I have watched on more than the one day's brief voyage of his childish memory. God guide him through Earth's wilderness to Heaven—child of my adoption—son of my heart! Mary, the teacher's trial was light; has not her reward been great?"

Mary dropped her tear-sprinkled cheek on her friend's shoulder, put her arm around her, and whispered—"Dear aunt, mother of my heart! your lesson shall not be lost!"

"'In due season ye shall reap, if ye faint not!'" said the old lady, as she laid her hand on the forehead of the young teacher, whose the last ray of summer sunlight had just gone out in glory.

AN APPEAL.—We commend to attention the appeal, in another column, of Miss Wormeley. The facts it reveals should commend the subject to the sympathy of the benevolent. Contributions in aid of John Gordon, or the woman Sarah, will be received at this office. *

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

SWITZERLAND, July 10, 1853.

A Sabbath in the mountains of Switzerland! There is something in that, especially on a day in midsummer—something to enjoy and remember. The scene is lovely; the day as quiet as true devotion. Do not expect a description. Word painting is not in my line; all I can do is, to suggest. Think of a bright little spot of earth, where two ranges of mountains have receded just far enough to allow a few husbandmen to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow—of a green valley through which a clear, swift brook makes music all day long—of gently sloping hills, rich in grass and grain, their sides gushing with cool springs—of waterfalls and sparkling fountains—of the everlasting mountains embracing all, crowned with the dark hemlock, or lifting their bare, white peaks to catch the first and the last rays of the sun—think of these things, and group them to please yourself, color them as your fancy may dictate, and then, though you may not see what we see, you may possibly feel as we feel on this day of our Lord in the mountains of Switzerland.

This is a Protestant region. The village is still; the people look clean and neat, in their Sunday clothes; the laborer is at rest; the bell of the little chapel on the hill, not far off, called the worshippers early to their devotions. It is a cleaner village than any we passed on our way from Basle to this place. In some of them, beds of manure were piled up against the dwellings, and dung pools stood at the kitchen door. The meats must have been nobly flavored. One hovel would often embrace, under a single roof, cattle, horses, and bed-room, communicating with one another, thus concentrating mutual comfort in brief space. This kind of filthiness is common to the continent. The huts of the peasants, and the little villages, are generally dirty beyond the conception of an American. We could not but notice in Switzerland that there was far more filth and squalor and poverty, and a great deal less industry and thrift, in the Catholic than in the Protestant portions of the canton.

The sun shone fiercely during our ride; but the bare-legged, bare-armed, and in many cases bare-headed, peasants in the fields did not seem to mind it. All along the way, in France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, there were apparently more women than men harvesting; the men are used for soldiers, the women for beasts of burden. There can be no objection to some out-of-door work for woman. Light employment in the field, for a few hours every day at certain seasons, may contribute to her health and physical development; but to make her a drudge, as the women of the poor are made on the continent, is rascally. Before middle age they become bent, masculine, blackened, and shrivelled; and while they labor, their children, too young for work, haunt the wayside as beggars. On the railway you escape from them: but in our carriage from Basle we were continually beset by them. Three or four would watch their opportunity, just as we were about rising a hill, knowing that we were then at their mercy; if we were stubborn, one or two of the more determined, on our reaching the summit, would trot along with us, bare-footed, with the sun scorching their white heads, till we were fairly overcome. I was fool enough to empty my pockets of everything but my gold, but on that point I stood invulnerable, much as I admired the pertinacity of the sturdy little beggars.

Everywhere we have found tracks of American. People say they are as plenty on the continent as Englishmen. Few of them speak any language but their own; but by the help of phrase books, and hotel keepers who have contrived to pick up English words for what their guests are most apt to call for in the way of eating and drinking, they "get along" tolerably well without starving. An English gentleman remarked to me, that Americans abroad were as stiff and reserved as his own countrymen. That is true only where they cannot make themselves understood. Brother Jonathan is a very sociable gentleman wherever he can hold intercourse; but when he cannot, he throws himself on his reserved rights, and becomes dignified upon compulsion. My own French is just a little better than nothing for speaking purposes. I can think of the right word, but scarcely ever at the right time; and seldom understand what is said to me in that language, till it is too late to answer. Our Swiss driver from Basle was recommended because he could speak French: so I seated myself beside him, determined to learn what I could from him; but I doubt whether he was much more proficient than myself, for he was almost as much puzzled to understand me, as I was to understand him. However, we passed the time quite sociably, taking a great deal for granted, making merry over our blunders, and at the end of the day congratulated ourselves on our mutual acquisitions. On one occasion I was sorely tried. We had got out of the carriage, and were walking up a long ascent in the road, quietly enjoying the fine scenery, when a Swiss gentleman, with his two daughters, overtook and politely greeted us. I responded, most rashly, in French; for, taking it for granted that we were accomplished in that language, he commenced a conversation at once. This I could have managed easily enough, by shifting the burden of reply to my companion; but, unluckily, the two bright-eyed Swiss girls graciously addressed themselves to me in particular, and that was a responsibility that had to be met. It was a terrible moment—confronted by two pretty ladies, talking sweetly at you in a strange tongue, and you, what with the effort to understand, and the effort to translate your own thoughts, and shame at your ignorance, utterly at your wit's end! I answered as I best could—tried to remember the names of all the places I had seen and wished to see—talked in nouns-substantive, leaving them to supply the particles—and caught myself gesticulating violently as a Frenchman. But the agony was too great to be protracted on so hot a day; and, pleading the fatigue of the ladies of our party, who I was sure wished to be seated, I bolted for the carriage. Never before had I been so eager to get rid of good company. As I took my seat I came to the conclusion that henceforth it would be wise not to venture beyond one's depth.

Whatever becomes of the "dead languages," French and German should be taught in every liberal institution of our country. American travel abroad is increasing largely every year, and our countrymen generally prefer the continent; travelling here is pleasanter and vastly cheaper than in England. But, how little can we know of a People with whom we can hold no free intercourse. We see the surface of their life, but cannot enter into its depths.

Paris, July 18, 1853.—Speaking of expense of travel, I should say that in England railroad fare is double, and hotel living three times, what they are on the continent. This is a point of some importance to our travelling countrymen. The hotel most frequented by Americans in London, is Morley's. I tried it for a week, unaware of its charges; but it is well to be able to speak in such matters from experience. The traveller orders a room, or any number of rooms he chooses, and is charged accordingly. He is then charged for whatever he orders for his meals—also for lights, for ice, for attendance, for everything. There are no common drawing-rooms for the guests; there is no common table. You live by yourself, and, before your friends, see nobody but a stiff, solemn, precise, silent waiter, with a black suit, white cravat, and very smooth hair. The bill of fare is a meagre one; but as I did not care to pay too much for my "whistle," I determined to live quite moderately, on much plainer food than I could content myself with at home. Living in this plain way, in two rooms—one, a small, dark chamber, the other, a tolerably-furnished sitting-room—it cost two of us, one week, only about $66—that is, at the rate of $33 each! Now, I think I can safely say to you, I know that this Morley's Hotel, so much talked of, is not equal in appearance, in furniture, in accommodations, in service, in fare when you order the best, or in any respect whatsoever, with a third-rate hotel in New York, where the fare is $2 a day, or less. Minart's is said to be much better, but the charges are still more enormous, and it is doubtful whether anything would be gained by going there, except more solemn and ceremonious service. I can conceive of no reason why an American should subject himself to the exactions of either, or, indeed, of any London hotel. He can live quite as respectably, more elegantly, and more comfortably, at nearly half the expense, in private apartments.

As to eating, an American abroad must make up his mind to forego many of the luxuries to which he is accustomed at home. Baker's bread, the French roll, and the brown loaf, are the only varieties of breadstuffs he can command in England or on the continent, and these are always cold, often stale, and, on the continent, most of Paris, poorly baked out of poor flour. Hot roll, short biscuit, batter-cake, pancake, flannel-cake, hoe-cake, Johnny-cake, dodgers, corn-batter bread—those delicious preparations of flour and meal, so well understood in our country—are unknown here. An English hotel has no table d'hote. You must compound your own dinner from such a bill of fare as it has, which is not very various. On the continent you find the table d'hote a mere suggestion of a dinner in an American hotel. The guests sit down, with an common table, and are first served with soup, then with fish cut up in convenient portions and passed around in waiters. While eating your fish, you see two or three joints, it may be of mutton, put on the table; they are then taken off, cut up in small slices, and the fish being disposed of, the sliced mutton is handed by the waiter to each guest, who is left to eat it by itself, or possibly with bread, or potato. Then, perhaps, comes some beefsteak, also prepared in small pieces, and handed round the same way, to be eaten by itself; and then, in succession, may follow some sweet bread and a few mutton chops. While eating the latter, there is a vision of roast beef; and this, too, disappears from the table, to be cut up, and to be passed round like the rest, and to be devoured probably by itself. Then, a dish of peas may be circulated; then the pudding, sliced up and carried round; then the salad; then a pair of very small chickens, which are carefully dissected before being sent on their errand. Finally comes the dessert, of fruit, &c. Thus, on a very meagre bill of fare, they manage to get up some ten or a dozen courses, which appear quite imposing, but there is nothing in them. Just imagine a New York hotel attempting to satisfy its guests, with beef, mutton, and chicken, cut up in small bits, with peas, potatoes, and lettuce, and calling this a sumptuous repast! To me, this table d'hote is a most detestable institution; my gorge always rises against it.

Some reader may perhaps think these are very small matters to notice; but the truth is, the habits of people interest me as much as the natural features of their country or their works of art. There are plenty of sight-seers to write grandiloquently about sublime scenery, and great pictures, and old cathedrals; and if there were not, the guide-books furnish all necessary information concerning these things. Indeed, sitting quietly in my room here in Paris, I could manufacture just as fine letters from memory and from illustrated works, of the Rhine, about the wonders of art and nature in Europe—not having seen them all—as if I had seen and carefully studied them all. However, should the whim seize me, I may say something of these things, too, hereafter. G. B.

DANIEL E. SICKLES.—This individual, who has heretofore occupied a prominent and not very reputable position among the politicians of New York, has received the appointment of Secretary of American Legation to the Court of Great Britain. The Evening Post says that "his personal character is such that the appointment is a serious disgrace to the Administration which makes it." It is said that Gov. Marcy declined to sign the commission of Sickles, which was certified by the Assistant Secretary of State. *

For the National Era.

A SERENADE.

Fair maiden, not with courtly song
I come to break thy slumbers,
For feeling's pulse is far too strong
For fashion's tutored numbers—
The sigh of sympathy is suppressed
This fair autumnal even—
Than can I lightly break thy rest—
Perchance thy dream of heaven.
Yet waken, though affection's tone
Is oft to thee confessing,
One heart, amid the crowd, alone
Would give to thine a blessing.

Sweet maiden, may the sky of youth
In softest blue spread o'er thee;
Thy heart retain its fearless truth,
Its wishes free as air.
I know that love can never wreath
For any thorniess rose,
But gentle peace will ever breathe
Where innocence repotes.
Yet waken! though affection's tone
Is oft to thee confessing,
One heart, amid the crowd, alone
Would give to thine a blessing.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE AT PHILADELPHIA.

This case is one of unusual interest, from the fact that it presents several important points which have not arisen in any previous case under the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Our readers must be contented with a very brief view of it from us. We derive and condense it from the Philadelphia papers—the Daily Register especially, which took care to report the proceedings in the most complete manner. Half a dozen of our columns would not hold the Register's report, if transcribed.

On the evening of the 21st of July, a difficulty took place in Moyamensing district, Philadelphia county, between some white and colored men. A white man is said to be severely beaten in the course of the affray. One of the ward constables arrested Fisher, (the fugitive slave in question,) at the scene of the disturbance, carried him before a magistrate, who committed him to prison on the oath of the constable. A few days after his commitment to prison, George F. Alberti, the well-known kidnapper of that city and vicinity, went to the Wilderman, and offered to go bail for Fisher. This was refused on good grounds, and freehold bail required. Alberti's offer was made, of course, as the means of getting possession of Fisher. Fisher's friends interposed at this juncture, and Littleton Hubert, a colored man of undoubted competency, justified as Fisher's bail in the sum of $500, and he was discharged from prison. His residence was at Fettersville, New Jersey, opposite Philadelphia, where his wife and four children are now. He is about twenty-five years of age; he "followed the river for a living:" he can read, but cannot write.

On Wednesday, the 20th of July, he was in Philadelphia, and was arrested, without warrant, by one of the city police officers, and taken to the Moyamensing station-house, where he was kept all night; the next morning, after the officer had an interview with Alberti, Fisher was taken to the office of an alderman, half a mile or more from the station-house, and away from the office of the police magistrate to which he was first carried. Shortly after Fisher's arrival at the alderman's office, Alberti, accompanied by the U. S. Marshal's officers, came in, with the warrant of Commissioner Ingraham, who in conjunction with Alberti, does up the fugitive slave business of Philadelphia, and Fisher was taken into custody, upon the claim of J. C. Howard, of Cecil county, Maryland. He was carried before Ingraham (Commissioner) on Thursday, the 21st. The claimant and his witnesses not having arrived from Elkton, the Commissioner adjourned the case till Friday afternoon.

In the mean time, Littletgn Hubert, the bail of Fisher for his appearance in the quarter sessions of Philadelphia county, to answer a charge of riot and assault and battery at the next sessions of the court, went into the same court, and, on his petition, setting forth the facts of the case, to wit—his custody of Fisher as his bail, and the arrest of Fisher by Marshal Wynkoop, of eastern district of Pennsylvania, asked a habeas corpus, directed to Marshal Wynkoop, and commanding the keeper of the county prison, commanding them to bring the body of Fisher into court, &c.

Judge Allison, of the Court of Quarter Sessions, granted the writ prayed for, and appointed ten o'clock on Saturday morning, the 23d instant, for the hearing of the case. This writ was immediately (that is, on the 22d) served upon the marshal, and a duplicate copy upon Mr. Freed, the keeper of the prison; but the marshal had in the mean time removed Fisher from the custody of the jailer, and so prevented him from obeying the writ, by bringing the body into court at the time appointed.

At the hearing before Ingraham, on Friday, Mr. Costelio appeared for Howard, the claimant, and William S. Pierce, Esq., appeared a counsel for the prisoner. Mr. Pierce, before the examination of the witnesses, notified the Commissioner that a habeas corpus had been granted by the State court, and asked the hearing by the Commissioner to be postponed until the habeas corpus should be disposed of. The counsel for the claimant objected. The Commissioner said that he would take no notice of the habeas corpus; that the proper plan was to make a return to the writ, and apply for an exoneration, on the ground that the party was before another tribunal previous to the issuing of the habeas corpus.

The witnesses were then examined, and after several were examined, the hearing was continued till Saturday morning, at ten o'clock A. M. On Saturday, after the examination of all the witnesses produced was concluded, Mr. Pierce again asked the Commissioner to postpone the further hearing of the case till after the habeas corpus should be disposed of by the State Court. The Commissioner again replied that the habeas corpus was not directed to him, and he would take no notice of it. The owner, Mr. Howard, then made oath that he was afraid of a rescue, and the Commissioner gave him a certificate, requiring the United States Marshal to safely and securely convey the prisoner to Maryland. Mr. Pierce proposed to examine the owner as to the ground of his apprehension of a rescue. The Commissioner decided that no person but the United States could object, and the claimant could not be interrogated. As soon as Mr. Howard had received the certificate, Mr. Pierce served another habeas corpus upon him, directing him to bring the body of Fisher before the Court of Quarter Sessions at ten o'clock. Mr. Howard said he would appear before the Court, and so the matter ended before Commissioner Ingraham.

Court of Quarter Sessions. Disobedience of Marshal Wynkoop. His attachment for contempt.

At ten o'clock, Saturday, J. W. Ashmead, counsel for U. S. Marshal Wynkoop, asked for an hour's time, to enable the marshal to prepare his return to the writ of habeas corpus, requiring him to bring the body of Fisher before the Court of Quarter Sessions. Judges Thompson, Kelley, and Allison, on the bench.

Mr. Pierce would not object to an hour's delay, if the prisoner was to be brought before the Court; but he would object, if the object was to evade the production of him. He stated that, when the writ was served upon the marshal the day before, he detained the party serving it, to make a copy of it, and used the time to remove the prisoner from the custody of the jailer, who otherwise would doubtless have obeyed the writ then about to be served upon him.

Mr. Ashmead said something in answer that looked like a denial of Mr. Pierce's charge against the marshal, and added, that he was free to say that this Court had no jurisdiction of the matter now before it, the prisoner being in the hands of the Marshal of the United States.

[This Mr. Ashmead is the same counsel, learned in the law, who framed the half hundred indictments for treason, in the Christiana cases, of immortal memory.]

After some further discussion of this question of jurisdiction, between the Court and Mr. Ashmead, Mr. Pierce asked for an attachment against the marshal, and the Court directed it to issue.

The attachment was given into the hands of the deputy sheriff of the county. After much delay and avoidance of the deputy sheriff, at twelve o'clock the marshal was brought into Court. The Court called upon him to explain why he had not obeyed the writ of habeas corpus. The marshal disclaimed any intention to offer contempt to the Court, and only wanted time to write his return to the writ. [It had been served upon him the day before.] The marshal then filed his answer, which averred that he held the slave by direction of the United States Commissioner, and that he was directed to take sufficient force to convey the prisoner into Maryland, and deliver him to his master.

Judge Thompson replied to Mr. Ashmead, who spoke in support of the sufficiency of the marshal's answer, and of the duty of officers in his service to the Commissioner's certificate and order, that "the Court has a right to know who takes away our citizens. We do not know that the U. S. Marshal holds the body, or that Mr. Wynkoop is the marshal. There is no clash of jurisdiction here. We desire to know whether any offence has been committed by the alleged slave against the laws of our State. We don't intend to take him out of the custody of the marshal."

After speeches by D. P. Brown and W. S. Pierce, Esqs., on behalf of the prisoner, and Mr. Ashmead for the marshal, Judge Thompson said the answer is insufficient, and the body of Fisher must be brought into Court by the marshal. Mr. Ashmead, after consultation with his client, answered, that the marshal declines bringing the body into Court, and that he stands upon his return.

Mr. Pierce then asked an attachment against the marshal for contempt. Judge Thompson said "that it is always to be regretted, when the acts of an officer were calculated to bring the Judiciary of the State and the United States into conflict. The States are sovereign, and their laws must be enforced, wherever it may lead us. The attachment is ordered to be issued."

The marshal was then taken into custody by the sheriff.

Thus stood the matter on Saturday.

U. S. District Court. His Honor Judge Kane presiding.

On Monday morning, the marshal being in the custody of the sheriff under the writ of attachment, Judge Thompson directed that officer to convey Mr. Wynkoop immediately to prison. Pending this order, Mr. Ashmead informed the sheriff that Francis M. Wynkoop was about to appear before the United States Court, and he would submit the affair to Judge Kane.

Judge Kane heard the application, and after a patient examination of it, decided that the United States Judiciary act alone gives to this Court the authority to issue a habeas corpus—the process asked for by Mr. Ashmead on behalf of the marshal—and reading the proviso to the 14th section of that act which declares that "No writ of habeas corpus shall issue to bring up the body of a person in jail, unless committed by a Federal Court, or is detained by authority, or color of authority, from the United States, or unless he is needed as a witness in a case pending in a Federal Court."

We cannot burden our abstract with the irrelevancies and obtuseness of Mr. Ashmead, Judge Kane bayed him to the mortar of his legal logic, through two columns of the Register's report, with what success we need not inquire, but to the clear conclusion that on the statement of the case the United States Courts have no power to issue the writ. Or if it were issued, that upon learning the marshal was in custody of the sheriff under process from the State Court, the writ must be quashed. On these terms Mr. Ashmead concluded that he would not ask the writ to issue.

After a consultation the marshal came into Court, made his own statement, and took a friendly lecture from Judge Kane, which we regret that our space will not allow us to give in full. Mr. Ashmead's share of Judge's counsel, also, would well repay perusal, but we must hasten to the result.

The Marshal before the State Court again, with submission, and an amended return.

After the hearing before Judge Kane, Mr. Wynkoop, in custody of the sheriff for contempt, appeared in the Court of Quarter Sessions, on Monday afternoon, with the body of Fisher, as commanded by the writ of habeas corpus served upon him on Friday; whereupon he was discharged from arrest. The Court then ordered a commitment to be made out for Fisher, to answer at Court, and to await the claim of the United States Marshal. Under this commitment, the sheriff's officer surrendered Fisher into the custody of the keeper of the Moyamensing prison.

The original Habeas Corpus. The Slave present in Court.

This morning, (Tuesday, July 26,) the original habeas corpus granted by Judge Allison, on the petition of Littleton Hubert, bail for Fisher, upon the charge of assault and battery, and inciting to riot, was heard before Judges Thompson and Allison, of the State Court. Fisher and Hubert represented by D. P. Brown and W. S. Pierce, Esqs. The marshal and his counsel, Mr. Ashmead, also present. After argument by the counsel for the prisoner and his bail. Judge Thompson said substantially, that

"The question which had been so ably argued was made to depend entirely upon the right the bail has to the custody of his principal. Let us see how the question arises. [The Judge then recited the return of the United States Marshal.]

"The return shows that the claim of the marshal to the prisoner is properly founded. Thus far, the case presents no difficulties. The question was argued before the arguments commenced, who represented the prisoner? and the response was, that counsel appeared for the bail and the prisoner both. The argument has not shown, that it can show that the Court should remand the prisoner to the custody of his bail. The matter is confined to two questions—first, what does the prisoner ask? This has not been discussed. The prisoner is here, and does not ask to be remanded to his bail. The second is—who is to have him, the bail or the marshal? The right of the bail to demand the custody, and the Court to grant it, is then the only question.

"That the bail has the right to the custody when the prisoner is taken from prison by him, is not denied. He asks it from him wherever and whenever found, and no one has the right to interfere with him in that right. Though the bail has this right, if he suffers the prisoner to go at large, he becomes subjected to other rights. This is settled by authority. The only difficulty is to apply these plain principles of law.

"This Court, while ready to sustain the rights of the Commonwealth, or any other rights, yet where the law points out a way for a bail to proceed, it is necessary for the rights of all that the proper forms of law shall be complied with. This has been neglected by the bail. Petersdorf on bail, shows that the principal need only attend Court on the day to which he is bound to appear, except where he has special notice from the bail. The Court nor anybody else can compel him to appear in Court. The bail alone can enforce it. He can control him on all occasions, and on all days. He has most power than the sheriff on active custody. This being the state of the case, our present action cannot be to surrender him to his bail. The prisoner don't ask it. He has not attempted to exercise the right which the law has confided to him. We cannot take it for granted that the marshal would not let the bail have the prisoner on a bail-piece. As the bail has taken the bail-piece, we will not interfere that he shall appear to answer.

"If the prisoner should be conveyed to another State, the bail must take the means to bring him back. It is the consequence of the risk he assumed. If the prisoner had been in national custody, this Court would not hesitate to enforce a compliance with the petition. As it is, we are bound by enforcing the writ of habeas corpus. The Court would require him to answer here first.

"There is no embarrassment in the case, and no collision of jurisdiction. The Fugitive law was never intended to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. The Constitution of the United States declares that this writ cannot be suspended, but in the contingencies mentioned. Wherever should attempt it, would come into conflict with that instrument, and he would be happy in restraining the attempt as in that present instance.

"As there is no conflict of jurisdiction, but is simply a question of the right of the bail to have the custody of the prisoner, upon his coming to us, and we declare that the prisoner is not in any way under the control of this Court, and therefore discharge him from the custody of the sheriff, where we placed him.

"The prisoner was then taken into custody by the United States Marshal, and immediately conveyed to a carriage, and taken on the route to Maryland.

"Mr. Pierce asked the Court for a bail-piece, and was informed that it was a writ of right.

"A bail-piece was made out by Mr. Sharkey, on the second bench, and handed to Littleton Hubert, who, with several others, started in pursuit of the marshal and his prisoner."

Subsequent History of the Case—Successful Dodge of the Marshal—Arrest of Alberti.

The Philadelphia Ledger briefly states that, "In remanding Fisher back to prison, on Tuesday, after the disposition of the habeas corpus, the marshal baffled his bail and the officers employed to pursue him, by proceeding to Paoli. Here he remained until the midnight train. Fisher was securely placed in a baggage-car, and he passed over the Columbia railroad en route for Baltimore. Guards were placed by the friends of the slave upon the direct lines to Baltimore."

The Baltimore Argus gives it thus:

"The United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Colonel F. M. Wynkoop, arrived in this city last evening, (the 27th inst.) with the fugitive slave Fisher, belonging to Mr. Howard, of Cecil county. Upon his arrival, the marshal surrendered the slave to his master's order, and left in the morning train for the seat of Government, Philadelphia. If the United States Government sustains the marshal in his late determination to retain the fugitive in his custody under all hazards, which it cannot fail to do, in consequence, Colonel Wynkoop has established a precedent worthy of all praise, and which will go far in allaying the fanatical zeal usually displayed by Northern Abolitionists in the attempt to release the law to be evaded by cunning machinations.

"In a conversation we had with the Colonel, we learn that another attempt at rescue was made in the shape of the indispensable bail-piece, previous to his leaving Philadelphia, which was only avoided by the marshal's foresight in driving with the negro incog. in a private carriage out of the limits of the State. Maryland slave owners should indeed be grateful for the indefatigable efforts of this meritorious officer."

And the Philadelphia Register supplies the following commentary, which spares the necessity for such reflections upon the conduct of this officer, as we would otherwise be constrained to make:

"Marshal Wynkoop.—The Bulletin is particularly severe in its comments on the conduct of this officer in the recent case. The Sun says: 'We can only infer from the opinion that he acted more like the partisan than the officer. He seems to have espoused the cause of Howard, the claimant, with unbecoming zeal. Why should he have disguished himself to remove Fisher from being deposited in the county prison, and, consequently, to prevent the service of the writ of habeas corpus on Mr. Freed? Why, too, should he have displayed so much ingenuity and activity in baffling the law of the State?

"The claimant in this case revived a claim of 8 years date. A bond servant, Fisher, is a man of honor that it was legal? Your sympathy with it was ill-becoming you, Marshal Wynkoop! Your alacrity to spirit away the poor creature out of the limits of the State, very a man who had long enjoyed the blessings of freedom. And all this, to add only a few hundred dollars to his large fortune. It was now—will he ask—legal to separate

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE BOYHOOD OF GREAT MEN: Intended as an Example to Youth. With Illustrations. New York: Harper & Brothers. For sale as above.

The preface says: "The object of these pages is to place before the reader brief sketches of the early career of those who have fought their way to eminence and distinction in the various walks of life; and thus to develop, in the mind of youth, noble tastes and high principles, as well as to encourage, stimulate, and sustain, that spirit of industry, which is essential to the attainment of any position worth striving for." Truly, a commendable object! The book shows much thought and a nice discrimination. *

THE UNITED STATES ILLUSTRATED, in Views of City and Country; with Descriptive and Historical Articles. Edited by Charles A. Dana. The East—Vol 1, No. 1; The West, Vol. 1, No. 1. N. York: Herrmann J. Meyer.

This promises to be a superb publication. It is Mr. Meyer's purpose to issue, within the year, two volumes—one devoted to the East, the other to the West—of ten numbers each, containing fine, large steel engravings, from pictures by eminent artists, of the most prominent objects of interest, both in scenery and architecture, of the two sections of country; and numbers to contain four engravings. Each subscriber or purchaser of the two volumes will receive to each section of the work an allegorio title-page, executed in a high style of art, and, as a premium, a magnificent steel engraving of the Battle of Bunker Hill, from Trumbull's great picture." The present numbers contain views of the President's House, in Washington; Niagara Falls; Barhydt's Lake, near Saratoga, and Bunker Hill Monument. Lake Ithasca, source of the Mississippi; Falls of St. Anthony, (two plates,) and San Francisco. The prices will be, for single numbers, each, fifty cents; two copies to one address, forty cents per number; five copies to one address, thirty-five cents per number; ten copies to one address, thirty cents per number. *

THE ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY RECORD OF THE NEW YORK EXHIBITION OF INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS. Edited by B. Silliman, Jr., and C. R. Goodrich, Esq., aided by eminent writers in each Department of Science and Art. The Artistic Department under the superintendence of C. E. Dejior, Esq. Published in the Crystal Palace, by G. P. Putnam & Co.

This journal purposes to perform the same office for the New York Exhibition as did the London Art Journal (in supplements) for last year's Exhibition, viz: Publish fine wood-cut engravings of the various works of art and science exhibited, accompanied by letter-press descriptions. It is a commendable undertaking; and, judging by the specimen number before us, will be a beautiful publication. Price, 25 cents per number. *

THE HISTORY OF THE RESTORATION OF MONARCHY IN FRANCE. By Alphonse de Lamartine. Author of "The History of the Girondists." Vol. IV. New York: Harper & Brothers. For sale by Farnham, Washington, D. C.

With the volume before us, this brilliant book is concluded. No historian of modern times—not even Macaulay—has done so much toward relieving history from the appellation of "dry reading." His books are charged with a poetic and magnetic enthusiasm, that takes one by the "button hole" (metaphorically) at the opening chapter, and does not release him till the colophon is reached; every page is ablaze with splendid imagery, and alive with surpassing eloquence. But how far the impression left upon one's mind by this is consonant with truth, we cannot say. *

A SECOND BOOK IN LATIN: Containing Syntax, and Reading Lessons in Prose, forming a sufficient Latin Reader; with Imitative Exercises and a Vocabulary. By John McClintock, D. D., late Professor of Ancient Languages in Dickinson College. New York: Harper & Brothers. For sale by Franck Taylor, Washington, D. C.

We have been too much hurried to give this book a thorough examination: but the fact that Prof. McClintock is the author, says more for its excellence than could half a column of commendation from us.

THE KNICKERBOCKER. July, 1853.

This Magazine has been so long and so indisputably the "good wine" that "needs no bush," that it is almost shameful for one to trouble his brain for a new suit of phrases in which to deck his compelled encomiums.

HUNT'S MERCHANTS' MAGAZINE AND COMMERCIAL REVIEW. Conducted by Freeman Hunt. Vol 29, No. 1. July, 1853.

A host of excellent articles are indexed in this number: Financial History of the Reign of Louis Philippe, Part 2, translated from the French of M. Dumon, late Minister of Finance; Mercantile Biography—George Hudson, the "Railroad King;" Traits of Trade—laudable and iniquitous — about Credit speculations; Commercial Cities and Towns of the United States, No. 34; The City of Savannah, by Jos. F. Greenough, of New York, late of Georgia; &c., &c. *

GRAHAM'S AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE. Aug. 1853.

Where is our July number? We know Graham to be a modest man—even to self-depreciation, sometimes—but we hope he will not carry it to the extreme of supposing that a hiatus in his visits will pass undetected or unspoken of. The number now in hand is admirably made up: we notice an exquisite poem by Boker—"Lida." *

APPLETON'S MECHANICS' MAGAZINE, and Engineers' Journal. Vol. 3, No. 7. July, 1853.

The excellence of this work seems to increase with age. This number opens with a large lithograph of the Inclined Engine of the ferry boat Manhattan, with letter-press description, and a full list of articles upon various branches of Mechanism and Engineering.

MEYER'S UNIVERSUM. Vol. 2, Part 1. Price, 25 cents. New York: Herrmann J. Meyer.

Mr. Meyer commences the second volume of this beautiful work with fresh indications to patronage. He says: "To all subscribers of volume 2, a most superb premium plate, engraved on steel—size, imperial-folio—of the Maid of Saragossa, after the celebrated picture of Westall, engraved by C. Mayer, will be delivered, gratis, with the last part of the volume." The number before us contains engravings of Columbia Bridge, Susquehannah; Scenery of the San Juan River, Central America; Laxenburg, and The Mausoleum of Goeckau, near Constantinople. *

THE UNION CRUSADE.

A year or two ago, a class of politicians known by the designation of "Union Savers," grew up and flourished. The danger to the Union was believed to be imminent, and those patriotic individuals resolved to hazard their popularity in defence of a Union which no considerable body of the people dreamed of opposing. They called meetings, made speeches, rose up early, and sat up till late, to achieve their objects, and the Union was subjected to salvation weekly through their efforts. The disease has about run its course. The recent Presidential election brought it to a crisis, and the patient, we are happy to say, bids fair to recover. Even some of the original parties to this Union-saving effort now rebuke some of the less-favored individuals who are attempting to galvanize the dead and buried humbug into life and vitality. A call for a convention to organize a National Union party, to meet at Newburyport on 5th of September, has been issued. It is signed by Hunker Whigs and Democrats. The objects proposed by the originators of this movement are thus set forth:

"This new party will be devoted to the cause of National Union. It will be pledged to uphold the Constitution, the Union, the laws, and to stand by our National Government long after all other parties cease to have an existence.

"Under its state organization it will withhold its support in all future state and national elections from every element of disunion, and from all candidates for office not pledged to carry out the principles, policy, and measures of this new party.

"We also unite in a call for a National Union Party Convention, in the city of Washington, on the 22d of February next, to be fully represented by delegates from all parties, and by the American people from every Congressional district, State, and Territory of the American Union.

"In the belief that the present organization of political parties under their antiquated issues, policy, and measures, tend to separate the Government from the people, and endanger the Union, (liberty,) two copies to one address, forty cents per number; five copies to one address, thirty-five cents per number; ten copies to one address, thirty cents per number. *

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The steamships Washington and Niagara have arrived since our last, with London and Liverpool dates to the 23d inst.

Russia and Turkey.—Respecting the Eastern difficulties, there is no doubt that the reception given by the Emperor of Russia to the proposition from France and England was so favorable as to warrant the expectation that the question in dispute will be settled without further difficulty. It is also very probable, we think, that Nicholas himself dictated the terms, and had them tendered to him for his acceptance. The Cabinet of England had made no disclosures yet.

At Constantinople, a conspiracy to assassinate the Sultan was detected, and fifteen of the leaders arrested and bow-stringed. The conspirators proposed to depose the Sultan and declare war against Russia. The Turks do not organize a National Union party. It is expected that the Russians will, in any event, continue to occupy the Danubian provinces till spring, on the pretext that the army is in winter quarters, and cannot be disturbed. There are great disturbances in Constantinople, and are probably enough the work of Russian emissaries; at least, they would serve the purposes of the Autocrat. The Hungarian prisoner, Costa, rescued from the Austrian brig at Smyrna, has been placed in the custody of the French Consul, to await the decision of the case. The American captain, whose gallantry we noticed in our last in this affair, is Ingraham, and not Stringham.

France.—There was a rumor in Paris that the American Minister at Constantinople had addressed a note to the Sultan, announcing that the United States would associate with other forces, to support the Turkish integrity, and would henceforth claim a voice in the affairs of Europe. Not very likely.

The French press mostly viewed the Eastern difficulties as about over.

British India.—Lord Dalhousie, already in the occupancy of the Burmese Territory of Pegue, has declared it annexed to the British dominions. The Burmese have refused to cede it to the British, and they are proceeding to establish themselves in it by force.

China.—The insurgents have possession of the city of Naukin, where, it is said, they have raised the banner of Christianity, and recognised the Protestant worship. The rebels were waiting reinforcements from the south, previous to advancing upon Pekin. It is reported that they have a very complete translation of the Bible; that they acknowledge the one God, the creator of the world; with him Jesus Christ, as the saviour of mankind, and the Holy Ghost, last of the persons of the Trinity. Their moral code they call the "heavenly rules." It is the Ten Commandments. They threaten the destruction of the whole Tartar race. If this news is true, or nearly true, "the world does move," and the American tribes, on the highway to the White Sea, via California and the Sandwich Islands, have an agency in its affairs that will bring up the doctrine of intervention some day soon. The United States, however, will begin to feel over its borders. Yankee pedlers and Chinese coolies will commence the interchange, and the prejudice of color will soften a little.

If we begin to look after European refugees with American passports, and bring up Austrian brigs all standing under our guns, our consuls may as well put on epaulets. Negotiation and annexation together will put a girdle round the earth sooner or later, and our rights of territory, right of security over a broad margin of inimical institutions, and the honor of our flag, hitherto so little regarded, may yet be called in to aid the ingenuity of our statesmen. Young America is not fenced in yet.

Mexico seems to be busy cooking up a quarrel for our settlement. The Mesilla valley affair is kept stewing in the Government journals, as if it might boil over some day.

Who is sufficient for all these things? What did our fathers mean by calling us the United States of America, omitting the world north, middle, or east? What did they mean by the Continental Congress? Was it by anticipation that they selected the terms? We have a guess, and our children will see. E.

INDEPENDENT DEMOCRATIC MOVEMENTS.

NEW YORK.

Madison County.—The delegates from the several towns composing the second Assembly district, assembled at Sullivan on the 23d ult. Dr. N. C. Powers was chosen Chairman, and D. H. Frost and D. E. Hackell, Secretaries.

Charles Stroud was nominated for Assembly; district and town committees were appointed; Jasper Blair, Charles A. Spencer, D. H. Frost, W. B. Downer, David Wood, and Sidney Roberts, were appointed delegates to the Independent Democratic Senatorial Convention at Syracuse, and John Snow was chosen as delegate to the State Convention, with N. C. Powers as substitute.

The Democrats of the south Assembly district of Madison county met at Eaton on the 23d. Adon Smith, Esq., of Hamilton, was nominated for Assembly, and Samuel S. Abbott as delegate to the State Convention.

Twentieth Senatorial District.—The delegates of the Independent Democracy of Oswego and Madison counties met at Syracuse on the 30th July. Andrew S. Warner was chosen Chairman, and D. H. Frost Secretary. After consultation, the name of William W. Farwell was unanimously nominated for the Senate.

The Convention then appointed the following gentlemen as a Corresponding Committee for the Senatorial and Congressional district, composed of the counties of Oswego and Madison: C. Dwight Burch, Hamilton, Chairman; A. Spencer, Canastota; M. Barnett, Morrisville; R. H. Spencer, Oswego; S. C. Huntington, Pulaski; A. Loomis, Fulton.

ILLINOIS.

Kendall County.—A Convention of the Independent Democracy met at Newark, July 8th, for the purpose of organization. Rev. A. Day was chosen President; R. Murdock and Zenas McEwen, Vice Presidents; and Dr. N. L. Coon, Secretary. A Constitution was adopted. We copy articles 1 and 2:

Art. 1. This Association shall be known as the "Free Democratic Association" of Kendall county.

Art. 2—Sec. 1. This Association adopts the platform adopted by the Free Democratic National Convention, held at Pittsburgh on the 11th and 12th of August, 1852, as a basis of its political principles and doctrines, which it will zealously endeavor to maintain, until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of a change.

Sec. 2. Believing that the application of these principles and measures to the affairs of government is essential to the peace, prosperity, and perpetuity of this Union, we do therefore hereby pledge ourselves to each other, and to the world, to use all laudable and honorable means to insure the success of the same; and we also pledge ourselves not to vote for any person, for any legislative office whatever, who is known to us to be hostile to the foregoing principles and measures.

The other articles relate to the appointment of officers of the Association, and their duties. A County Committee, consisting of Elisha B. Wright, G. Kendall, L. Childs, N. L. Coon, and Michael Lewis, was appointed.

The following officers of the County Association were chosen:

President—Archibald Sears; Vice Presidents—M. Ewen, J. B. Lowry; Corresponding Secretary—H. H. Moulton; Recording Secretary—O. Barstow; Treasurer—James McClellan.

Town Committees.—Oswego—Dr. Jewell; Bristol—L. Childs, S. S. Gillam, M. W. Lane; Kendall—West. Matlack, R. Murdock, John Young; Little Rock—George H. Reed, G. H. Rogers, N. C. Wright; Fox—T. Whitney, Wm. H. Lewis, A. P. Kennedy; Lisbon—C. P. Bushnell, O. Barstow, G. T. Norton; Big Grove—Wm. W. Wilson, Henry McEwen, H. M. Day.

Resolved, That the committee for the towns be requested to call, as soon as practicable, town meetings, for the purpose of effecting the organization of the town divisions of the County Association. *

SHALL CALIFORNIA BE DIVIDED?

We are pleased to record that recent indications do not promise success to the efforts of the Slavery propagandists to divide this free State, and set off a portion of it as the domain of the institution which has proved a blight to some of the Atlantic States. The platform adopted by the Democratic Convention of California, on the 24th of June last, declares it to be the true policy of the State "that the public lands be disposed of in limited quantities to actual settlers;" that the party cherishes as among the best features in the Constitution of the State, "those which protect the laborer from degradation and oppression," and that their increasing permanent population "demands a more complete organization of the common school system." The fourth resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That we recognise to the fullest extent, the principle that all political powers exist in the hands of the people, and that constitutions and laws are but the expressions of the popular will. Therefore, we deprecate any change of the Constitution of the State, other than by amendment, until such an amendment shall have been incorporated in it as shall guaranty to the people that the Constitution prepared by a convention for its revision shall be submitted to the people for their ratification.

A party in California urged the adoption of a Constitution framed by a Convention, and in the late session of the Legislature refused to submit an amendment securing to the people the right to vote upon such Constitution. The Democrats have asserted this right, and we trust will sustain it. It would be a shame and a disgrace in this age of the world, if by any means the efforts so long made and so perseveringly insisted upon, to carry the blight of Slavery to the Pacific coast, should prevail. We trust the question is now set at rest, and that California will maintain her freedom intact, despite the machinations to form a slave State out of a portion of her territory. *

ABOLITION IN NEW ORLEANS.

A New Orleans correspondent of a Natchez paper discusses the subject of slavery, and sees that "abolitionism" is making fearful progress in the South, and that "the spirit of Abolitionism, hot-bed of Anti-Slavery," the origin of which "may be traced to that system of amalgamation which has been practised ever since slavery was known in Louisiana." Another evil, which he says should be eradicated, is the "schools established for the education of free negroes, but where the slaves are also permitted to receive the rudiments of an education." The negroes have also erected a large brick church, "where the services are performed by a negro minister, in direct violation of the laws of the State;" and what he probably regards as worse than all, "the negroes, both free and slaves, have their benevolent associations, their widows' charitable society, burying society, and various other societies, where such as complain, whether justly or not, of unnatural oppression from a hard task-master, are entitled to such assistance as the state of the funds and the necessities of the applicant would seem to warrant."

By this showing, negroes are not destitute of natural affection, and improvident or careless of each other's interests. *

PACIFIC RAILROAD SURVEYS.—Col. Benton has transmitted to the Intelligencer a letter from Mr. Harris Heap, companion of Superintendent Beale in his central route expedition to California. Col. B. says: "People will be astonished to read that, from the frontier of Missouri to the Valley of San Luis, at the head of the Del Norte, there is not an obstruction to a railroad any way comparable to what is found between Baltimore and Washington, and that the whole route is through a beautiful country, rich in soil, grass, water, and game. In fact, finding game every day itself tells the character of the country; for every Western man knows game is not found in a desert, nor even in a poor country." It announces the fact, that through the entire line which the party had explored, embracing, it is said, the most difficult portion of the line, the construction of the road is not only practicable at all easy grade, but the country is well-watered and fertile, and such as to invite settlers and cultivators throughout. This will be pleasing news to those who favor the central route. *

AUGUST ELECTIONS.

Kentucky.—The returns received from the election in this State show the following result:

1st district, Linn Boyd, dem.; 2d, Benj. Edwards, dem.; 3d, Wm. Preston, whig; 4th, Leslie Combs, whig; 5th, Clement S. Hill, whig, (gain;) 6th, Dr. Pierce, whig; 7th, Wm. Preston, whig; 8th, John C. Breckenridge, dem.; 9th, Alex. H. H. Stuart, whig, (gain;) 10th, George B. Hodge, whig, (gain).

The Whigs have carried both branches of the Legislature by increased majorities.

Tennessee.—The vote for Governor in about one-third of the State has been heard from. Johnson, democrat, gains over the Presidential election 1,000 votes. The Legislature is doubtful.

North Carolina.—The result of the Congressional election in this State, as far as ascertained, is as follows: In the 3d district, Ashe, dem., is elected. In the 2d, Ruffin, dem., elected. In the 4th, Rogers, whig, elected by 29 majority over Venable and Lewis, dem. This is a whig gain. In the 1st district, (Outlaw's,) the result is doubtful, with the chances in favor of Dr. Shaw.

In the Salisbury district, the chances are in favor of the election of Burton Craige, democrat. There is nothing reliable from other districts.

Alabama.—Colonel Winston, dem., is elected Governor. The election for the Congressional delegation, as far as heard from, indicates the election of Sampson W. Harris, dem., in the 3d district; George S. Houston, Union democrat, in the 5th; W. R. Cobb, dem., in the 6th; and James T. Dowdell, dem., in the 7th. Aberecrombie, whig, is probably elected in the 2d district, by a small majority. In Mobile, a portion of the 1st district, Philip Phillips, dem., has a majority of 200 over E. Lockwood, the whig candidate.

Missouri.—Telegraphic reports state that Claiborne F. Jackson, anti-Benton, and Samuel D. Caruthers, whig, are elected to Congress.

Iowa.—Thirty out of forty members, have been elected Attorney General of Iowa.

A PALPABLE HIT.—In the course of a discussion in the Massachusetts Convention, a good deal was said about the licentiousness of the press, whereupon Col. Schouler, of Boston, made a very fair retort:

"A great deal has been said about the licentiousness of the public press. Now, sir, I happened to have a great deal to do with the public press, and I must say that the most licentious part of my experience with the public press has been in the defence of men in public stations. [Great laughter.] I trust, Mr. President, I am not out of order. Great laughter. Other editors, besides Colonel Schouler, can doubtless make a similar confession, albeit they will thus trumpet forth their own shame. *

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

Indications by the Foreign News—Warlike Aspects and Prospects—The Bible and the Bayonet—The New York Celebration of British West Indian Emancipation—Mr. Garrison's Speech—The Tribune Party of Ohio Disowned—Steamers—A New Plan for "Negro Cabins," &c., &c.

NEW YORK, August 6th, 1853.

To the Editor of the National Era:

By arrivals within the last few days, we have the usual avalanche of statements and surmises and speculations respecting the prospects of a conflict between Russia and Turkey—a story, so old, that one would think it would have, ere this, become stale, flat, and unprofitable, had not his observation taught him that "pomp and circumstance of glorious war" have a peculiar attraction for most of men, somehow or other; that, in spite of Christ's teaching, it is still a seeing their fellow beings cut each other's throats, and to glost over the bare prospect of their getting to work at the interesting job.

It is exceedingly difficult to make up an opinion, as to the result of the movements of Russia and Austria in fulfilment of their designs upon Turkey. But there is one fact, very prevalent, we, and it is a fact too, that, in spite of all, at last resort, which controls the civilized world. There is no doubt about the growth of this pacific feeling. What is the primary and chief cause, I know not; may be it is the spirit of commerce, which is always selfish; or it may be a direct moral advancement in the sympathies of the people, bringing them at length to some degree of appreciation of the principle of Universal Brotherhood. It may be either of these causes or both acting co-operatively. But no matter what is the cause, it is a pleasing theme for congratulation.

So far as the motives of Russia and Austria are concerned, they evidently have an eye to self-interest, and do not mean to let slip the golden opportunity of pocketing Turkey, in between them, if they can help it. And it is to be feared that neither England nor France will give itself much trouble to prevent it. "Alas! for poor Poland!" Alas! for the Hungarians! as once was, "Alas! for poor Poland!" Nothing will prevent her downfall and spoliation, sooner or later. To depend on the interposition of any foreign power, to save her from it, would be to depend on a broken staff, especially in the absence of all prospect of making much by the arrangement. It is the height of verdancy to expect of a nation which has played the bandit herself over and over again, and despoiled and stolen the lands of other nations, to do much in the way of peace-making, unless something is to be made by it.

Meanwhile, the insurgents in China are represented by the news to be still in the way of triumph. There is a good deal of rejoicing in some of the papers—the Journal of Commerce especially—over the alleged spreading of the Bible and Christianity being carried into ascendency in China, as in Turkey also, at the point of the bayonet! The circumstance of this class of papers rejoicing, and the news as clearly indicating how much of the name there will be without the practical reality.

I attended the New York Anti-Slavery Society's celebration of the anniversary of British West Indian Emancipation, at Flushing. The attendance was good, considering the inaccessibility of the place, and other circumstances. There was a good proportion of Hicksites in attendance, as was quite natural, and altogether appropriate on an occasion of celebrating the emancipation of eight hundred thousand of their down-trodden and oppressed race from the thraldom of the worst form of despotism that ever cursed the earth—worst because of its pettiness, all other considerations aside. Lucretia Mott presided, and Oliver Johnson acting as Secretary. The leading speaker—the orator of the day, as the phrase is—Mr. GRELEY, was not on hand. Mr. Garrison's speech was a strong, pithy, and clearly-spoken, and unusually terse one. It was strikingly free from the sounding denunciations which mark this gentleman's less jubilant speeches at the Anti-Slavery Conventions of his party. Kind, yet making no compromise of his distinctive views of the Church and the State, Mr. Garrison has a degree of self-adapting power in his speaking which I confess, from a former occasion with agreeable surprise. I allude to the late Hale dinner at Boston. The conciliatory tone of his speech on that occasion called out the commendations of the leading presses of the political Anti-Slavery class, as it deserved to do.

The other speakers were Mrs. Rose, of this city, and Frederick Douglass, both of them as seasonable, rising to genuine eloquence at times; J. B. Taft, an agent of McGrawville College; Frederick Crowe, the English gentleman, whose Guatemala colonial scheme I noticed some time ago; Dr. Wellington, Rowland Johnson, Thomas Van Rensalaer, and Mr. Wilkins. We have named these speakers in the order of their appearance, not without design. They were all listened to with great attention, as well as the last ones; and, even when they did speak, they were introduced as persons who "desired to say something," or equivalent expressions, showing that they were not acquainted with the declared policy and usual custom of our no-voting friends, might have readily inferred a disposition to avoid the responsibility of "amalgamation." And here, in the most pleasant and friendly way, I feel moved to say that it surprised us to see not a single colored person on the platform yesterday, although in the discussion was included the question of an event, as I have already said, of special interest to the colored race! It seemed to me, as it did to others whose attention was arrested by the omission, that it would have been most befitting to have secured the attendance of some one or more of the many distinguished colored orators of the country, or at least put those who were present on more distinct terms of participative equality.

I feel that, even at the risk of having my motives misconstrued, in relation to an occasion where there was much to interest, please and gratify the sincere friends of liberty, without distinctions, that I ought to give a gentle hint on another feature of the proceedings. I noticed that the Hicksite Friends introduced some of the other speakers also, proclaimed the by no means unusual fact that they had sought the opportunity, in phrases similar to those quoted above, to "relieve" such "embarrassing" would have been such a refrigeratory and seemingly invidious form of introduction, it would have required a much more than ordinary manifestation of the spirit, to have been important and to be accomplished, to induce me to break silence after it. I was the more surprised at the innovation upon general custom, because of the general deference and courtesy of the presiding officer in carrying out the programme of the day. If these kindly suggestions prove serviceable on future like occasions, I shall not regret the mild rap of them.

In a laudatory and deserved notice of the general facilities of intercommunication between the East and West, furnished by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and the Union line of steamers running from Wheeling to Louisville, given by the St. Louis News, I find among the specifications of peculiar advantages, the statement that the route offers "great inducements for families;" by reason of the steamer accommodations, as we understand the drift of the article. Happening to have inspected one of the steamers after the Union line, I was particularly struck with the appropriateness of the name in connection with a certain "Union saving" arrangement thereon, which I do not remember to have seen noticed elsewhere. This is a sort of negro cabin which, separate and distinct from the ladies' and gentlemen's cabins, arranged expressly, as I was told, for the "being of a character to please particularly the preference of the Abolitionists." This extra cabin is furnished with sleeping apartments, well calculated, as they did, to remind me of pig-sties; and it is entirely separated from the rest of the boat, so that ingress is inadmissible, except by a private stairway running down to the portion of the deck occupied by these "slave-pens," the place which would have been awful in the eyes of the owners of the chattels, or of the officers of the boat. From this, I must be excused for inferring that the "families" whose "convenience" seems to have been consulted, are the "slave families" carried to Missouri, and farther down South.

Now, I am curious to know whether the idea of the special precaution here indicated, and not found on the older-fashioned Ohio steamers, originated in the perusal of the interviews between little Eva and Uncle Tom, on the Mississippi steamer, and other interviews and incidents so graphically described by Mrs. Stowe, in "the greatest book since the canon of Scripture was closed," to quote the language of the Alabama slaveholder to the Evening Post? Who can satisfy my curiosity on this head? Perhaps some of the officials of your Washington branch road can answer.

While awaiting an answer to this question, I must be allowed to call the attention of all apologists for the domestic slave trade to this peculiar arrangement, "for the convenience of families," and to ask them what they have to say to this new "hole."

There is another query, which I would put to apologists generally, and it is, if the slaves are really so much attached to their owners, and so contented, as we are assured they are, why is such extra barrier between their locomotive muscles and liberty deemed so necessary? INDICATOR.

CAMPAIGN MEETINGS IN OHIO.

The calls are so urgent for Mr. Lewis, in every county of the State, that the committee feel compelled to modify the plan of the appointments of last week, in order to comply, as far as possible, with these calls. We therefore assign but one meeting to each county of the following series, with the appointments:

We have received communications from many of these counties, nearly all of which urge two or more meetings. Friends, we would be glad to accommodate you, but we cannot; and we here take this occasion to thank you for the prompt and satisfactory manner in which you have responded to our notice. We have answered your numerous letters; but knowing that we cannot answer all, and fearing that in our hurry we may overlook some, we want you to understand that we have paid the attention to your letters, and have tried, in making appointments, to comply with the majority. If we have erred, it has been without partiality.

Now, make a grand rally at our single country meetings, which will occur in the following order:

Jackson, Jackson county, Thursday, August 11th.

Portsmouth, Scioto county, Friday, August 12th.

Ironton, Lawrence county, Saturday, August 13th.

Porter, Gallia county, Monday, August 15th.

Rutland, Meigs county, Tuesday, Aug. 16th.

Athens, Athens county, Wednesday, August 17th.

Chesterfield, Morgan county, Thursday, Aug. 18th.

Zanesville, Muskingam county, Friday, Aug. 19th.

Cambridge, Guernsey co., Saturday, August 20th.

Scarabsville, Noble county, Monday, August 22d.

Woodsfield, Monroe county, Thursday, Aug. 23d.

The above appointments will be filled by Mr. Lewis, and others. Further appointments will be noticed in due time.

We urge early and extensive notices. Give the speakers an earnest and hearty reception.

A NEW VOLUME

OF WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET commences with the July number, and of course now is a favorable time for new subscribers. It is and to the wise is said to be sufficient, though the Publisher begs to employ two words, just to say that the Cabinet—the most popular illustrated dollar magazine in the Union—is more captivating than ever. The editor, (Francis C. Woodworth,) in his Foreign Sketches, is now rambling in Italy, and sending the wonderful ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii. The Biography of distinguished Americans is still continued. Try this magazine. You will find it just the thing for your family. Each number contains 48 pages. There are two volumes a year, one commencing in July, the other in January. *A yearly volume embraces nearly 600 pages, and about 100

LINES TO FREDRICKA BREMER.

BY LUCY.

Lady, I may not join the throng
That press around thee now;
I may not look, with throbbing heart,
And eyes wherein sweet tear-drops start,
Upon thy gentle brow.

I've pictured in it summer hours,
When step and heart were light;
When the clear blinds, in air and love,
Were inclined thrown with the heart in me,
And my sky with hope was bright.

Thou wert by my side, and thy words were glad,
Full of hope, and tones of cheer;
Thou told me of good in the gift of life,
And my heart beat high for the coming strife,
Nor know one thought of fear.

But there came an hour of woe, ere long;
My sky grew dark and dread.
The summer sun, and the soft balmy air,
The joyous birds in the forest fair—
Their light, their song, was dead.

And my heart was a weary and desolate thing,
And its tones were of woe and sorrow;
Tears, burning tears, in that long, lone night,
Swept over my soul, a withering blight,
And I looked to no hopeful morrow.

But, lady, thou with thy words of hope
Want my soul's sweet sister then;
With healing hope my heart grew light,
With faiter dawn my sky grew bright,
As I turned to thy page again.

And I saw how love and a purpose high
May arm the soul with power
To walk in faith life's darkest ways,
To hymn 'mid the shadows high thoughts of praise,
And light life's parting hour.

'Twas joy to walk with the spirits pure
That thronged my pathway then,
And I longed to fill a nobler part,
With Edna's strength, with Nina's heart,
To live and love again.

To live and love! And when, at last,
This earthly life is done,
To dwell 'mid joys of purest birth,
Where the sweet love we know on earth
And heaven's high bliss are one.

Being a Compilation from the Writings of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and others, whose names are consecrated in the affections of the Southern People—the Debates in the Federal and State Conventions which framed and ratified the Constitution of the United States—those which occurred in the first Congresses which sat during the Administration of General Washington—and extracts from the Debate in the Virginia Legislature in 1832; with various letters, judicial decisions, &c.

EXTRACTS FROM MR. JEFFERSON'S CORRESPONDENCE—VOL. IV.

[To Jared Sparks.—Continued.]

I do not say this to induce an inference that the getting rid of them is forever impossible; for that is neither my opinion nor my hope; but only that it cannot be done in this way. There is, I think, a way in which it may be done—that is, by emancipating the afterborn, leaving them, on due compensation, with their mothers, until their services are worth their maintenance, and then passing them to industrious occupations, until a proper age for deportation. This was the result of my reflections on the subject five and forty years ago, and I have never yet been able to conceive any other practicable plan. It was blended in the Notes on Virginia, under the fourteenth query. The estimated value of the new-born infant is below, (say twelve dollars and fifteen cents,) that it would probably be yielded by the owner gratis, and would thus reduce the six hundred millions of dollars—the first head of expense—within reasonable bounds. Who would pay the expenses of nourishment while with the mother, and of transportation. And from what fund are these expenses to be furnished? Why not the fund of the land from which have been ceded by the very States now needing this relief?—and ceded on no consideration, for the most part, but that of the general good of the whole. These cessions are equivalent to three-fourth of the States of the Union. It may be said that these lands have been sold, are now the property of the citizens composing those States; and the money has been already paid and expended. But an equivalent of lands in the territories since acquired may be appropriated to that object, or so much, at least, as may be sufficient; and the object, although more important to the slave States, is highly so to the others also, if they were serious in their arguments on the Missouri question. The slave States, too, if more interested, would also contribute more by their generous liberality, thus taking on themselves alone the first and heaviest item of expense. In the plan sketched in the Notes on Virginia, no particular place of asylum was specified, because it was thought possible that, in the revolutionary state of America, then commenced, events might open to us some one within practicable distance. This has now happened. Mexico, long an independent, and with a population of that color only; and, if the public papers are to be credited, their chief offers to pay their passages, to receive them as free citizens, and to provide them employment. This leaves, then, for the general Confederacy, no expense but of nurture with the mother a few years, and would cost, of course, for our proportion, the propriation of the vacant lands. Suppose the whole annual increase to be of sixty thousand effective births; fifty vessels, of four hundred tons burthen each, would transport annually, in that short run, would carry off the increase of every year, and the old stock would die off in the ordinary course of nature, lessening from the commencement until it ceased to exist in existence. In this way, no violation of private right is proposed. Voluntary surrenders would probably come in as fast as the means to be provided for their conveyance shall be competent to it. Looking at my own State only—and I presume not to speak for the others—I verily believe that this surrender of property would not amount to more, annually, than the sum of our direct taxes, to be continued fully above twenty or twenty-five years, and then gradually diminishing for as many more, until their final extinction; and even this direct tax would not be paid in cash, but by the delivery of an object which they have never yet known or counted as part of their property; and those not possessing the object will be called on for nothing. I do not go into all the details of the burdens and benefits of this operation. And who could estimate its blessed effects? I leave this to those, who will live to see their accomplishment, and to enjoy a benediction forbidden to my age. But I leave it with this admonition, to rise and be doing. A million and a half are within their control; but six millions, which a majority of those now living will see them attain, and one million of these fighting men, will say, "We will not go."

I am aware that this subject involves some constitutional scruples. I feel, but a liberal construction, justified by the object, may go far, and an amendment of the Constitution the whole length necessary. The separation of infants from their mothers, too, would produce some scruples of humanity; but this would be straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel.

I am much pleased to see that you have taken up the subject of Colonization. An important book I hope a crusade will be kept up against it, until those in power shall become sensible of this stain on our legislation, and shall wipe it from their code, and from the remembrance of man, if possible.

I salute you with assurances of high respect and esteem. TH. JEFFERSON.

Extract from a letter, written by Thomas Jefferson, addressed to Edward Coles.

I had always hoped that the younger generation, receiving their early impressions after the flame of liberty had spread itself in every breast, and had become, as it were, the vital spark of every American, that the generous temperament of youth, analogous to the motion of their blood, and above the suggestions of avarice, would have sympathized with oppression wherever found, and proved their love of liberty beyond their own share of it.

But my intercourse with them, since my return, has not been sufficient to ascertain that they had made, towards this point, the progress I had hoped. Your solitary but welcome voice is the first which has brought this sound to my ear; and I have been anxious to ascertain where, which prevails on this subject as indicating an apathy unfavorable to every hope. Yet the hour of emancipation is advancing, in the march of time. It will come; and, whether brought on by the generous energies of our own minds, or by the bloody process of St. Domingo, excited and conducted by the power of our present enemy, if once obtained permanently within our country, and offering asylum and arms to the oppressed, is a leaf of our history not yet turned over.

As to the means by which this difficult work is to be effected, if permitted to be done by ourselves, I have seen no proposition so expedient, on the whole, as that of emancipation of those born after a given day, and of their education and apprentiseship to a proper age.

I am sensible of the partialities with which you have looked towards me as the person who should undertake this salutary but arduous work. But this, my friend, is a task fending old Priam to buckle the armor of Hector: "Trementibus æevo humeris et inutile ferrum cingitur." No, I have overlived the generation with which most of my labors and cares had mutual confidence and influence. This enterprise is for the young—for those who can follow it up, and bear it through to its consummation.

It shall have all my prayers, and these are the only weapons of an old man; but, in the mean time, are you right in abandoning this property, and your country with it? I think not.

My opinion has ever been, that until more can be done for them, we should endeavor, with those who have them, to lighten the yoke on hands, to feed and clothe them well, protect them from ill usage, require such reasonable labor only as is performed by free men, and be all by no stringency to be indicate them, and our duties to them. The laws do not permit us to turn them loose, if that were for their good; and to commute them for other property is to commit them to those whose usage to them we cannot control. I hope, then, my dear sir, you will reconcile yourself to your country and its unfortunate condition, and that you will not lessen its stock of sound disposition by withdrawing your proportion from the mass. Keep on the contrary, you will come forward in the public councils, become the missionary of the doctrine truly Christian, insinuate and inculcate it softly but firmly through the medium of writing and conversation, associate others in your labors, and, when the phalanx is formed, bring on and press the proposition perseveringly, until its accomplishment. It is an overwhelming observation, that no good measure was ever proposed, which, if duly pursued, failed to prevail in the end. We have proof of this, in the history of our revolution,
